Officers face discipline in shooting

Michael Kunzelman
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BATON ROUGE, La. — The investigation of a deadly police shooting that inflamed racial tensions in Louisiana's capital city has ended without criminal charges against two white officers who confronted a black man outside a convenience store two summers ago.

But experts in police tactics think the bloodshed could have been avoided if the Baton Rouge officers had done more to defuse the encounter with Alton Sterling. They say poor tactics and techniques may have aggravated the volatile confrontation, which lasted less than 90 seconds.

Sterling's death fits a tragic pattern of "utterly preventable" police shootings and reinforces an urgent need for sweeping cultural changes in law enforcement training and procedures, said former Seattle police Chief Norm Stamper, author of the 2016 book "Protect and Serve: How to Fix America's Police." The fatal shooting of an unarmed black man in Sacramento, California, last week appears to be the latest example of the persistent problem, he added.

"These cops in Baton Rouge, in Sacramento, everywhere, are doing what they've been taught to do. Most of these controversial shootings are the result of conditioning and training," Stamper said.

Federal authorities consulted two independent experts who concluded the Baton Rouge officers, Blane Salamoni and Howie Lake II, employed poor tactics. One of them said "tactical problems" may have escalated the situation. However, those use-of-force experts ultimately concluded that the officers used "reasonable" force against Sterling, according to a report released Tuesday by Louisiana Attorney General Jeff Landry.

Landry ruled out charges against the two officers nearly 11 months after the U.S. Justice Department announced neither officer would be charged with federal crimes. Now that the criminal investigations are over, Baton Rouge's police chief plans to decide by Friday whether to discipline Salamoni or Lake for their actions in the early morning hours of July 5, 2016.

Charles Key Sr., one of the experts consulted by the Justice Department, concluded the officers' actions created tactical problems that may have escalated the threat. Key told federal investigators that the officers should have engaged Sterling at gunpoint "from a position of cover" instead of initially approaching him up close.

"Tactically, the officers didn't handle it very well," Key said during a telephone interview this week. "Their tactics put them at risk."

Stamper said too many officers are trained to think they can't back down from a fight and consider survival first, instead of safety.

"It's just critical that police officers start with the sanctity of human life," he said.

Salamoni shot Sterling six times during a struggle outside the store where the 37-year-old black man was selling homemade CDs. Lake helped wrestle Sterling to the ground, but he didn't fire his gun.

The officers recovered a loaded revolver from Sterling's pocket. As a convicted felon, Sterling could not legally carry a gun.

Two cellphone videos of the shooting quickly spread on social media, prompting protests. Baton Rouge Police Chief Murphy Paul said he will release other videos of the incident, including footage from the officers' body cameras and the store's surveillance camera, after he makes a disciplinary decision.

Video footage shows Sterling threatening someone with a firearm outside the Triple S Food Mart before the officers responded to a report of a man with a gun outside the store, according to Landry's report.

The officers told Sterling to put his hands on the hood of a car and struggled with him when he didn't comply, the report said. Salamoni drew his weapon and, using expletives, threatened to shoot him in the head if he didn't stop resisting, the report added.

Sharpton: Stephon Clark's death 'woke up the nation'

Sam Amick and Doug Stanglin
USA TODAY

SACRAMENTO — Activist Al Sharpton, addressing the funeral for an unarmed black man killed by police, derided the White House on Thursday for dismissing the killing as a "local matter" and said Stephon Clark's death would force the nation to confront police violence.

Sharpton gave the eulogy for Clark, 22, to the overflowing Bayside of South Sacramento Church as he held tightly to Stephon's distraught brother, Stevante, who frequently grabbed the microphone.

The funeral came after 10 days of protests and community anger over the killing of Clark, who was shot March 18 by two police officers responding to a report of someone breaking car windows.

The officers said they thought Clark, who had just entered his grandparents' backyard, was holding a gun, but he was found with only a cellphone.

In his brief remarks, Sharpton noted that White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders, when asked Wednesday why President Donald Trump had not addressed the shooting, referred to Clark's killing as a "local matter."

"This is not a local matter," Sharpton shouted. "They have been killing young black men all over the country, and we are here to say that we are going to stand with Stephon Clark and his family."

Sharpton told mourners that Clark "woke up the nation."

"We are going to make Donald Trump and the whole world deal with the issue of police conduct," he said.

Cecile Thompson, whose four children were with her outside the church, said Clark's killing was especially painful.

"No mother should have to go through this and lose their children this type of way," Thompson said. "This is horrific, this is violence, and all mothers need to get up and stand for peace and love because our children should not be dying like this."

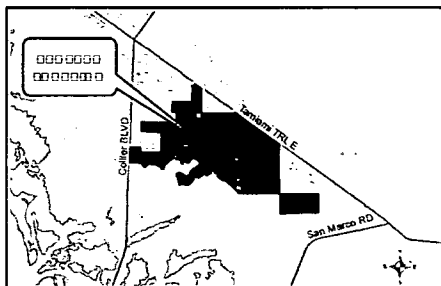

Some mourners attending Wednesday's wake called for police to face criminal charges or donned black shirts calling for justice.

The killing has sparked more than a week of anger and mostly nonviolent protests, including disrupting traffic and blocking access to two pro basketball games.
